

Responsibility to Protect in Theory and Practice

Edited by: Dr. Vasilka Sancin, Mag. Maša Kovič Dine

Responsibility to Protect in Theory and Practice offers a collection of papers presented at the Responsibility to Protect in Theory and Practice Conference. The concept of Responsibility to Protect (R2P), first presented in the 2001 report of the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty, and adopted without a vote at the United Nations 2005 World Summit, recognizes that the fundamental principle of international law of State sovereignty includes also the responsibility of States to protect their populations.

As the R2P concept is relatively new, there are a plethora of questions that need to be addressed and answered to ensure its effective use in situations where the protection of the population is necessary.

International Environmental Law: Contemporary Concerns and Challenges

Edited by: Dr. Vasilka Sancin

International environmental law today faces a broad spectrum of global challenges from sufficient levels of protection of biodiversity, forests, marine environment and outer space to integration of multilateral environmental agreements, concerns of international adjudication and the confluence of patent law and foreign investments with environment. These issues and others, such as the protection of the environment in peace operations, the responsibility of transnational corporations for environmental protection, green economy and energy efficiency are critically addressed in this book and innovative solutions are provided both by international legal experts and environmental scientists. The book is thus a unique example of an interdisciplinary response to the global environmental challenges of humankind.
